ASX Grains

Growing potential

Grain has been a major agricultural export for Australia for more than a century. Recognised for the quality of our product, Australian grains remain structurally important to the global market.

All commodity markets have exposure to volatility, by using ASX futures and options contracts you can mitigate this risk, manage future cash flows and receive or deliver physical grain. Furthermore, the ASX promotes transparent and liquid markets to a wide range of participants on an anonymous platform.

Australian grains

Australian grains are an important contributor to the national economy. Prices are influenced by domestic and international supply and demand dynamics. This balance is subject to continuing shifts in weather patterns, cropping cycles, consumer demand and freight dynamics. ASX futures and options products facilitate price discovery and efficient risk management for market participants ranging from grower/producers through the supply chain to end users, as well as banks and market intermediaries.

Strategies to manage your exposure

ASX futures and options offer effective tools to manage price risk and exposure. ASX contracts are centrally cleared and allow participants to manage portfolio exposure without counterparty risk. All grains are physically deliverable, ensuring price convergence to the underlying commodity market and increasing their validity as a hedging tool.

ASX – a heritage with the land

The origin of Australia's futures trading can be traced back to 1960 when ASX began trading as the Sydney Greasy Wool Futures Exchange. Today, we are proud to draw upon our long history of risk management provision to Australia's agricultural industry.

Customer protection

Backed by significant capital and collateral, ASX's clearing and settlement infrastructure supports the world-class reputation of Australia's financial markets. As the central counterparty, the Clearing House becomes the seller to every buyer and the buyer to every seller, making it liable for completing all cleared transactions. ASX provides centralised clearing and settlement for all grains contracts, helping to reduce counterparty and systemic risk and provide certainty to market participants.
